Field notes

The first paragraph sets the scene with plain English words that fill the column from margin to margin across several lines of text.

In Jerusalem the greeting שלום עליכם is heard every morning, and visitors quickly learn that the reply is עליכם שלום with a smile.

Another paragraph follows, longer than the others so that the columns break at different heights and the baselines fall out of step.

The shop sign read חנות ספרים above the door, and the price list said 25 shekels for a paperback, cash only.

Arabic appears too: the word مرحبا means hello and كتاب means book, as the teacher wrote on the board in the second lesson.

A closing paragraph in the second column mentions תודה רבה at the end of a long sentence that wraps.

More filler text so that the second column receives several paragraphs and the gaps between paragraphs land on different baselines than the first column's lines.

The museum guide said ברוכים הבאים to every group, then switched to English for the tour of the old city walls.

The final line has the words בית ספר in it, and then a few more English words to finish.